

-----GENERALNEWS-----

Hi All

Florian Schneider, who as one of the founding members of German group Kraftwerk changed the sound of pop music forever, has died aged 73 of cancer.

The news was confirmed to the Guardian by one of his musical collaborators, who said Schneider had died a week ago and had a private burial. It was also confirmed via Sony Berlin.

Born in 1947, Schneider was the son of Paul Schneider-Esbelen, a noted architect who designed Cologne's airport. Schneider first played music in various groups while studying in Düsseldorf, beginning in a band called Pissoff. Operating in the experimental, open-minded rock scene dubbed "krautrock" in the British press, he formed the group Organisation with Ralf Hutter, the pair later forming Kraftwerk in 1970.

Kraftwerk is one of the pillars of our scene and with brilliant releases o its name! It is sad that we lost one of the founding fathers of our music!

This is uploaded by Gery Wright and was a great set that I enjoyed live that day!!

Seeing as there is a lack of live concerts going on at the moment due to this horrible virus thing, I thought it was the right time to upload our E-Scape concert from last year.

Huge thanks to Anton Uraletz for filming this (unknown to us at the time :-), you did a fantastic job Anton), and to everyone on the day including my band mates Colin Jordan and Chris Medway. It was an amazing experience for all of us, and we think it went quite well.

In producing this video I mixed the video footage with the soundboard recording for better quality audio, and also includes the room ambience to give it that "live" atmosphere. Hope you enjoy watching it

78569 Brainwork - 2020 The Synthfonie

Brainwork goes classic! And it's not bad. You just have to give the music a chance and let yourself be enveloped by the multiple philharmonic strata that float and swirl while embracing the emotions of the moment. It won't be the first time that Uwe Saher destabilizes his fans with an album they are impatiently waiting for without really knowing what awaits them. Sometimes it's good Berlin School, other times it's hellish dance rhythms while other times it's the fusion of both styles! This time, Brainwork goes classic! In a completely exceptional production, the German musician offers 3 visions of philharmonic music woven into the interstices of his synths. And this creative power merged with good minimalist Berlin School gives results far beyond expectations after an uncertain first listening. 2020 THE SYNTHFONIE joins visionaries such as Synergy, Tomita and Vangelis in a melodically musical envelope.

The kind of thing you hear in a romantic film, horns and violins entwine in a very harmonious serenade. A stream of limpid sequences sparkles just below these bursts of cinematic romance that infiltrate our ears without any problem. Uwe Saher puts The Serious Part in mode charm with arpeggios clanging like xylophone's hits which climbs these immense orchestral layers, like a metronome setting the tone at a linear rhythm. Between lightness and more austere moments, the music of this long symphonic saga travels with its subtleties and its diversities in a musical vision where it's difficult to separate acoustics from electronics. There are nice falls of arpeggios which are lost in the ambient rhythm of The Serious Part's minimalist sequencing patterns, like there are falls of violin which gives a darker vision without being lost in an abyss without musicality. There are very slow phases where the violin strings moan in a very electronic ambience. Other times, slow staccatos caress our ears in this long title, always sweet and very musical, except for the finale which pushes its velocity in the cables of ferocity with bursts of violins. Viral shocks, I hear Tomita here, which fades and comes back for some less violent tears in a fight of 3 to 4 minutes, affecting the serenity of The Serious Part but which won't wake the one who dozed heavily in the first 20 minutes of a track that you find more and more beautiful with each new listening.

Between Synergy's Metropolitain Suite and Audion, and the orchestral-theatrical vision of Walter C. Rothe in Let the Night Last Forever, The Epic Part offers a very good start. The gentle orchestral caresses, in the same tones of The Serious Part, are composed of two underlying lines which are grafted to a soft bass line with a morphyic purring. Quietly, the music weaves its embellishments that come together end to end, piece by piece in what becomes a long river of minimalist orchestrations. Shimmering sequences and melodious arpeggios weave their powers of attraction on this bass line as sensual as divinely astral which brings us to a galaxy where oases of serenity follow one another endlessly. Garlands of sequences regularly illuminate the slow movements of astral choreographies which make us float with a musicality so harmonious that earworms form in an entrenched vision. Between seraphic beauty and its few phases of torment, The Epic Part is a splendid title, more electronic I would say than The Serious Part, that we want to hear again after each listening. Everything is sweet here. From violin eruptions with peaks of torment to transformations of dreamy and floating strata, the phases of this title are exchanged in a flawless harmonic vision to let a shocking intonation pass. Both for the ears and the senses. A little gem signed Uwe Saher! On the other hand, I would have stopped the symphonic adventure after this title! Not that Da Capo is useless. This is a very Philip Glass vision, notably the album The Photographer, which is so out of tune in the serene and enchanting decor of 2020 THE SYNTHFONIE with voices structures are paired with keen staccato violins.

I love Brainwork music. And above all, I love the audacity of Uwe Saher who always manages to breathe this little something that makes his music an adventure always captivating. 2020 THE SYNTHFONIE is not perfect! It almost is ...

23512 Canovas, Javi - Desert Dawn

"Desert Dawn" by Javi Canovas.

"Atlas" begins with piano notes and chiming like ethereal middle eastern bells, then a groovy bass rhythm kicks in and an enchanting tune plays. I imagine snake charmers are working their magic on snakes. It is certainly drawing me in, this weaving and hypnotising music. Wonderful stuff.

"River Luccus" starts with a brief intro that is haunting, then a very percussive rhythmic brew of all manner of instruments gets your whole body moving. It's like a spell is being cast on you in an east meets west kind of way. A type of flute and various drums work really well. I imagine being in Jerusalem in biblical times, and belly dancers are entertaining the king during festivities. The piece ends with atmospheric synth sounds. Very enjoyable.

"Thar" starts with a beautiful tune played on piano, but sounds like xylophone. Lovely synth atmos' washes in with effects, a relaxing build up and occasional percussion is used with effects. Eventually powerful synth sounds and 'tom tom' type drums kick in, then the atmos' gets heavy and flute plays a lead line. A deep synth groove is introduced and what sounds like a kaval (wind instrument-like a flute) is playing. This great piece concludes with piano and heavy atmos. Excellent.

"Blue Desert" starts with atmos and 'xylophone' and 'tom tom' sounding percussion with flute/kaval. I feel as if I am in Cairo in the rush hour. Just let your imagination run away with you. The wind instrument plays a delightful tune here.

"Fez" begins with haunting synth atmos' and percussion and heavy bass rhythm. Piano notes cascade up and down the scales and a tune plays ethereal music with a touch of drama to a groovy end.

"Nouadhibou" begins with synth atmos' and although the title is the name of a city, this music actually makes me imagine cool air flowing across the desert at sunrise, and sand rushes by creating ripple formations to flow and ebb like a river. Eventually this is replaced with just percussion and flute playing a positive tune of hope and promise. After a short while this is underpinned with a bass line and more percussion. Suddenly, a heavy synth noise interrupts and I am thrown back into atmospheric bliss with a flute accompanying, then fades to a lovely end. I really did enjoy the eastern feelings of this album, giving it a different feel to his usual stuff.

This album Javi dedicates to all his love and memory of his parents.
